Advice I wish I had when I was an Emerging Artist

If you're a slave to your reference, you will always be an ORDINARY painter.

You want your work to be design-driven, with you in charge.

Relish your mistakes. No mistakes suggests no progress.

Don't waste your money on cheap art supplies. It will only hinder your development.

Learn to paint fast.

Spending 6 hours on a painting when you're a beginner won't teach you anything. You'll just be bored, frustrated, and not wanting to go in the studio.

Paint small paintings:

20-30 minute bite sizes. You'll learn more, learn faster, be far more brave, and as an added bonus, have a whole keg of fun.

I wish I had this knowledge from the start. I would be farther ahead of where I am today.

Do not take rejection personally.

Not everyone will love your work, and that is perfectly okay. Your job is to find those who love what you do.

Learn to self critique early on.

Find areas to work on, of course, but it's just as important to find your strengths. Celebrate those. They will be a key to marketing yourself.

It's not about the art.

You don't get to decide what your paintings sell for (if you want to be successful that is), the market does. Your job is to find your market and get to work influencing it.

The very best way to become the best you can be is to get coaching and mentoring from your favorite master artists.

Know design inside and out. A strong, compelling design is over half the battle of creating successful art.

Get comfortable with growth and change.

While in a state of vulnerability and openness, lean into growth. Sometimes this change will be painful – do it anyway.

Mindfulness is the secret sauce.

Practice it along with any other skills you're learning.

You can't build a blossoming art career solely based on existing or previous work.

You must keep producing new pieces, show you are constantly evolving, and demonstrate your willingness to grow by adding tangible art to your history.

It's the only way to prove you are an artist worth investing in.

CHOOSE YOUR MENTOR

170+ Mentors to Choose From. New Mentors added weekly. Large selection of day/time, medium, specialty, and more!

Trust your instincts.

You don't need to use the same tools others are using. When I was an art student studying painting, my professors wanted us all to use very large brushes. That said, do not become so entrenched with one tool or one way of working. I think the key is balance. Trust yourself and see where your instincts lead you.

Be open to learning from others, trying new ways of working, and new tools alongside specializing in your favorite tools.

Mastrius is revolutionizing the creatives training industry by making it easy for motivated artists and craft masters to connect in personal & high-feedback relationships.
